The Department of Community and Government Services' Consumer Affairs division is advising Nunavummiut of a recent increase in telemarketing phone calls. While most telemarketers operate ethically, you still need to protect yourself from phone fraud.

Deceptive telemarketers target individuals through various tactics, including:

- Asking for your banking or credit card details.
- Offering prizes that require you to pay or by asking for cash or money orders.
- Posing as authority figures or pretending to be a friend to get your information.

Recognize the signs:

- Unrealistic promises of prizes or investments.
- Pressure to pay immediately.
- Requests for personal financial details or cash transactions.
- Impersonation of officials or attempts to build rapport.

Protect yourself:

- Remember that genuine businesses provide information willingly.
- Verify callers by requesting written details and time to consider offers.
- Avoid sharing confidential information unless certain about the legitimacy.

If a call feels suspicious, trust your instincts and hang up. Seek advice from trusted individuals. It's wise to be cautious.
